Monday, 05 January 2009

LG has finally unveiled their new LED TV, the super slim and gigantic. At a simple 24.8mm with measuring a huge 55in across, it's definitely an announcement of aim and it looks amazing in the flesh, having trapped a sight at a special sample occasion in Korea last November.

Other than this, it packs in HD DivX, leasing you catch up HD movies via USB or Bluetooth for examination out snaps and makes sure there will be bounty to watch on the miraculous 2,000,000:1 contrast screen with 240Hz technology .

The speakers are hidden, but still supply a muscular sound and you also get LG's own smart antenna tech as usual. This is one of the slimmest, top looking LCDs we've heard about so far, we'll see if it impresses in person shortly. So make sure you keep your eyes locked on for first impressions. Sadly there's no value yet, but don't imagine it to come low-priced.
